(Please do not let yourself be overwhelmed by the ostensibly lengthy bibliography. If you look carefully, there is in fact very little material. If it appears more lengthy, it is because the references are detailed and at the end of the long titles of books and names of specific chapters you will often discover that actually you read very little. In fact the bibliography below is by no means complete and is welcome to explore the library on your own.)

UNIT I

I. Interpreting Early Medieval India, circa 750-1200

One can disaggregate this topic into three parts. [a] The discussion of sources would involve a general survey of available evidence most frequently used by historians via, epigraphic, numismatic and literary works. [b] Divergent ways in which modern history writing for the period 750-1200 has developed and issues at stake in respective traditions of historiography, and [c] Various perspectives on [non]existence of a feudal phase in Indian history, especially with reference to early medieval India.

a. Sources and Historiography

- Chattopadhyaya, B. D. 2003. The Study of Early India: In Studying Early India by B. D. Chattopadhyaya, 3-25. Delhi: Permanent Black.
The essay discusses the relevance of the period designated 'early India' as well as 'early medieval India'. In the process, it also surveys the available sources and the varied directions in which historiography for the period has developed.
- Jha, D. N. 2000. Introduction to The Feudal Order: State, Society and Ideology in Early Medieval India, ed., D. N. Jha, 1-60. Delhi: Manohar.
D. N. Jha discusses the pros and cons of using the 'feudalism hypothesis' for the early medieval period. The essay also contains valuable references to the most commonly used sources for the period.
